Chemistry is book clearinghouse

The University's chemistry department is serving as a national clearinghouse to collect and distribute used chemistry books and journals to U.S. and foreign colleges and universities.

Two years ago the American Chemical Society, based in Washington, D.C., invited universities to compete for designation as the center for the new program. Bowling Green's successful bid was prepared by Ellen Dalton, chemistry.

Dalton recalled her own distress in discarding her deceased father-in-law's collection of chemistry books and journals when no suitable recipient could be found. Suspecting this was a typical dilemma for many retired scientists, she saw the ACS invitation as a rare opportunity to conserve valuable materials and help students on a global scale.

Bowling Green was selected as the site in 1984, with a three-year commitment of funds from the ACS to operate Project Bookshare. The project requires that chemistry books not be more than 10 years old (classics excepted). The titles of books and journals are submitted by prospective donors to the ACS for approval.

Upon acceptance, the materials are shipped to Bowling Green at the donors' (tax-deductible) expense, catalogued and stored by Dalton and student assistants. Catalogs have been sent periodically to approximately 500 needy small colleges in the United States and to 170 others in 70 developing countries. Recipients specify the materials they wish to receive for the cost of postage.

The solicitation notices first appeared in February 1985. Dalton did not have to wait long for a response. Larger universities and corporations sent holdings they had pruned from their own libraries. A retired scientist was inspired to clear out his shelves. A Cleveland widow sent her deceased husband's collection of 200 books, plus journals dating back to 1907. One chemical company shipped books in 800 boxes, each weighing 50-60 pounds.

Toward the end of 1985 the contribution was more than 3,000 books, 4,200 bound volumes of journals and more than 33,000 unbound issues of journals. The total tipped the scales at nearly 26 tons.

Dalton produced an 84-page catalog listing each book or journal, the respective field of study each represented as well as the authors and publication dates.

Copies of the catalogs were mailed to institutions in September 1985. By January 1986, Dalton and her crew had responded by sending 1,050 books and 730 volumes of journals to 71 small colleges in the U.S. and to universities in Argentina, Bolivia, China, Malaysia, Papua New Guinea and the Philippines.

There is one nagging hitch according to Dalton. Many prospective foreign recipients cannot afford to pay the freight charges. She is hopeful private, humanitarian resources will emerge to fill this gap in the delivery process.

She is also hopeful that Project Bookshare will be adopted by others in such fields as biological sciences, mathematics and physics.

"Project Bookshare demonstrates a great and widespread need as well as a generous willingness to meet the need," said Douglas Neckers, chair, chemistry. "The more that is shared in improving worldwide educational resources, the better the world's chances for human progress."
